

Mills Oakley boosts Workers Compensation practice

14 February, 2020

Leading independent law firm Mills Oakley is expanding its Workers Compensation practice with the hire of Accredited Specialist and Partner Danny Khoshaba from Hunt & Hunt.

Mr Khoshaba is an insurance litigator, specialising in workers compensation and work injury damages claims. He has a track record for successfully defending claims at the Courts and at the Workers Compensation Commission.

Danny is respected for his thought leadership, having acted as an advocate for workers compensation reform in reviews conducted by regulatory and other statutory bodies. He is respected by clients for his expertise in the application of the finer legislative provisions relating to the investigation and determination of claims. Prior to joining Hunt & Hunt, he practised in-house for Suncorp/ GIO.

Mills Oakley CEO John Nerurker said that this hire was a response to client demand:

“On a number of recent occasions, we have been invited to respond to a tender requiring national WorkCover expertise. The arrival of Danny, along with our hire of Workplace Relations partner and workers compensation specialist Rachael Sutton last year, means we are closer to ensuring a comprehensive, cross-practice approach to servicing this demand,” he said.

Mr Khoshaba added that he was impressed by Mills Oakley’s track record for thought leadership: “The ability to anticipate the future direction of the regulatory landscape is part of the value add which is increasingly expected by clients,” he said. “I am delighted to be part of a firm that has a culture of supporting an innovative and forward-thinking approach to client service.”

Danny commenced with Mills Oakley last month, bringing a team of eight with him, including Consultant Anthony Morrissey, Senior Associate Jordan Mitchell and Lawyers Katia Guido, Shabnam Thompson and Sherilyn Dunkley.
